Not illustrated. 1898 Excerpt: .of affairs that we have come to a point where we must be content with such relief as may be temporary in its character and be simply tentative so far as it looks towards permanent relief to the court. A second division, constituted precisely as was appointed under the previous constitutional provision, would not at this time be practicable without greatly interfering with, and to a very considerable extent destroying, the efficiency of the Supreme Court, both in the appellate branch and in the first instance, since the Supreme Court is organized in such a manner at this time as to do its most effective work and bring about what is regarded as the best results in that respect. Anything in the way of designation of justices of the Supreme Court, exclusively so as to form a second division, would, therefore, necessarily, be such an interference with the present working system as to be deprecated upon all hands. It produced much inconvenience in 1889, and that difficulty would not be remedied by the provisions under which new judges have been elected in the several districts, since the increase in the number of judges sitting in the Appellate Division has rendered the increase in the working force in most of the districts very slight, twentytwo judges being now assigned to the Appellate Division and not authorized by law to perform any other functions for which they were elected, while under the arrangement previous to the present Constitution,...
